Neural network modeling is often concerned with stimulus-driven responses, but most of the activity in the brain is internally generated. Here, we review network models of internally generated activity, focusing on three types of network dynamics: (a) sustained responses to transient stimuli, which provide a model of working memory; (b neural network dynamics. FIRING-RATE AND SPIKING NETWORK MODELS The power of present-day computers permits simulation of large networks, even in cases when the individual neurons are modeled in considerable detail. Of course, there is a trade-off between the amount of detail that can be devoted to modeling each individual neuron (or each synapse, which is even more costly owing to their larger
